And now the pensive maiden attires herself in her best and visits the dry goods stores where she innocently asks for samples of satin and silk for a dress. And the clerk in his innocence cuts them off and hands them to her, and she hastens home and in fiendish glee works them into a "crazy cushion." She also roams through the house and purloins her brother's neckties and compels her young men to give up his favorite silk handkerchief and neck-gear. And in due time she produces the cushion and her male friends with one accord exclaim, Delirium tremens! Jimjams!

Lovers of beautiful foliage will be perfectly satisfied. A ride through some of our wooded road at this season of the year gives greater enjoyment perhaps than at any other time. The air by its mildness reminds us of the summer which has gone, and yet there is in it a suggestion of winter which makes the blood course through the body with quicker flow, and makes our enjoyment and appreciation of the beautiful scenery keener from the thought that we are soon to lose it. Unquestionably, the time to enjoy the country is in the Fall. He who takes his vacation in midsummer often is able to do no more than to keep still in order to be comfortable, and returns to the city to resume his work in the midst of the heat which he sought to escape. One, however, who takes his vacation in October can use every minute of the time out-of doors and is impelled to do so by the glorious weather, and when he returns to his work, does so refreshed and at a time of the year when all his new energy will not be expended in battling with the heat. We think that the advantage of taking a vacation in the Fall is being seen more and more every year, and by others than sportsmen.

A Movement With Influence.

We should like to call the attention of those who think that civil service reform is an issue that has no practical bearing on the election in Massachusetts, to the letters of almost every candidate for congressional and other honors throughout the state on this subject. In these letters the candidates have felt called upon to give their views as in favor of this movement. We would call attention to the occasion of a large number of voters in Mr. Candler's district who, not satisfied with his record on this question, have mustered such a list of names asking Mr. Haskell of the Boston Herald, a well known advocate of this reform, to allow the use of his name as a candidate for Congress. We would call attention to the small majority by which representative Bowman, who, notwithstanding his protest in his letter of acceptance, has always been classed as an opponent of civil service reform, received his renomination. More particularly would we call attention to the stand taken in regard to this reform by the Democratic party of this state in the statement of principles put forth at their last convention. The charge that the party has taken this position merely to secure votes only goes to prove that this movement has become so strong as to command the respect of politicians.

Mrs. Balley who resided last summer with Mrs. F. H. Gannett died at her residence in Boston, Tuesday, Oct. 10.

A large number from this place attended the meeting of the Old Colony Baptist Association at Brockton yesterday.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY.

Last Sunday was the anniversary of the Baptist Sunday School and the following officers were elected. Supt., Chas. E. Bailey; Asst. Supt. Freeman H. Gannett; Secretary, Sarah R. Damon; Treasurer, Willard Bailey; Librarian, Irving E. Gannett. An anniversary service was held in the church in the afternoon the subject of which was "Thankfulness". Remarks were made by the Supt. Chas. E. Bailey, interspersed with singing by the choir. The address was delivered by Frank G. McFarlan of the Ruggles St. Church. The secretary's report showed that the number of the school was 163 of whom 8 were present at every session. The average attendance was 103. Fifteen members of the school were baptised during the year.

Mr. W. A. Cushing is having an addition put on his stable for a stitching room.

Six wild geese were shot in Accord Pond, Tuesday morning last, the first ones of the season.

Mr. Howard Gardner of South Hingham, 84 years of age, is very sick and his recovery is doubtful.

Some nice bass and pickerel have been taken from Accord Pond the past week. Some of them weighing over 3 pounds each.

Mr. B. M. Young is about to start again in business. His factory has been closed for a long time and we shall be glad to see it open once more. We wish him prosperity.

Ira B. Sanborn's house looks well in its new coat of paint, and Mrs. Loring Jacobs' soon will.

Cashman Bros. left for Plymouth last Tuesday. We understand they intend to open a house and board their hands.

We understand that John Grose has bought out Briggs' West Hanover Express and will run it in connection with his W. Scituate Express.

We have heard rumora that a new shoe manufactory was to be started in this place, and really hoped it might prove true, but fear from later reports that we shall be disappointed.

Daniel Webster and the United States Presidency.

AN INTERESTING INTERVIEW WITH THURLOW WEED.

"It is not generally known," said Thurlow Weed of New York, after a rubber of whist, for, though he can no longer make out the faces of his friends, he can still see the cards when placed in good light, "it is not generally known how near Webster came to being President."

"It is generally known," I said, "that he was a candidate for the Whig nomination five times and missed it every time."

"Yes," he acquiesed, "but he came a good deal nearer than that—a good deal nearer. I had always been among his most profound admirers, and wanted to see him President in 1840. But he became obvious to me during the winter that he couldn't get the nomination, that Harrison was leading. I went down to Washington early in the spring and called him into the cloak room. 'I think I shall be he said. I express my doubt of it. 'Who will be, then?' he asked. 'It looks to me like Harrison,' I answered. He sneered at the idea. He naturally had but little respect for mere military men, and he exclaimed, 'It is impossible that a man so ignorant as he, and so lacking in every quality of a chief magistrate can be nominated for such a place.' I told him it was simply a question of who could poll the most votes; and then I got him to sit down and look over my figures. They didn't convince him of course.

"Why you don't act as if you believed it yourself," he said, 'for you have chosen a Scott delegate for your own state.' That was to prevent the appointment of a Clay delegation," I said, "and Clay cannot be elected if nominated. But, Mr. Webster," I went on, "I haven't come to Washington to get you to withdraw your name, but to ask you to accept the nomination for Vice President in case Harrison shall be elected for the first place.' No, he wouldn't listen to such a proposal, and he refused with quite as much spirit as the occasion called for. So I came home and Harrison was nominated, and John Tyler was made his vice, and by the death of Harrison, Tyler became President a month after election. Webster saw the mistake he had made, and the next time I saw him—he was then

TYLER'S SECRETARY OF STATE—

He confessed it to me.

"Well, curiously enough, that wasn't the last of his fatal mistakes. In 1848 the very same thing happened right over again. In 1844 Clay had been defeated and taken out of the way, and now Webster thought he would walk over the course. I saw that General Taylor was likely to be the man, for after the Mexican war there was a great furore over Taylor. During the spring before the nomination I went to Marshfield. 'Well, what do you think of it this time?' asked Mr. Webster, with a smile of security

"'I think this time,' I said, 'that General Taylor will be the man.'

"He was astonished. It didn't look so at all to him. He thought it a very wild guess. 'Do you seriously think,' he asked, 'that such a man can be nominated?' I assured him that I thought it very probable. Taylor was then designated by those who did not admire him as who hasn't voted for forty years,' and Webster seemed to sympathize with this view. He remembered his former mistake and smiled, and said at last that he would consult his two best friends, George Ashmun of Massachusetts and Senator Wilson of New Hampshire, and do as they said.

"They were summoned and came. I met them at Mr. Webster's and presented my figures. They were nonplussed at first, but finally came to the conclusion that Taylor's nomination was probable, and they joined me in advising Mr. Webster to be content with second place if the first should prove beyond his reach. He reluctantly agreed to it, and I was authorized to see the arrangements carried out. Just at this point his son Fletcher came home from town, and he ridiculed the scheme so energetically and so bitterly that his father returned to his original position and refused to have anything to do with my proposal. Well, the Vice-Presidency went begging. The name of Fillmore was suddenly sprung upon the convention and he was put upon the ticket. Taylor and he were elected; Taylor died in four months and Fillmore became President, and Webster went down to Washington and served him as secretary of state, as he had similarly served the accidental Tyler. I think the pair of curious mishaps did a good deal to sour him, and, perhaps helped to make him reckless in his personal habits."

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Daniel Webster, b. at Salisbury (now Franklin), N. H., Jan. 18, 1782, being the second son of Ebenezer Webster by his second wife, Abigail Eastman; enjoyed but limited educational advantages in childhood, and was indebted for his earliest instruction to his mother; spent a few months in 1796 at Phillips Exeter Academy under Benjamin [illegible] preparation for college [illegible] Samuel Wood at [illegible] entered Dartmouth College in the autumn of 1797; [illegible] teaching school during the winter [illegible] considered the [illegible] scholar of his class [illegible] distinguished in the [illegible] of that college [illegible] several addresses which found their way into print; graduated 1801; entered the law office of Mr. Thompson (subsequently [illegible]) at Salisbury [illegible] Fryeburg, Me., where he was principal of the academy, and acted as copyist in the office of the register of deeds; completed his studies in the office of Christopher Gore, Boston, 1804–5, at which time he was assiduous in preparing reports of cases decided for the supreme and circuit courts; was admitted to the Suffolk bar in the spring of 1805; commenced practice at Boscawen, N. H.; removed to Portsmouth [illegible] to commence at a bar where Samuel Dexter, Joseph Story and Jeremiah Mason were at the height of their fame; married [illegible] N. H., June, 1808; became known as a decided Federalist, but did not at first [illegible]

a cordial support in his measures for the defence of the Union against the anarchial policy proclaimed by John C. Calhoun; made a notable speech in May, 1832, in favor of the renewal of the charter of the U. S. Bank; supported Henry Clay for the Presidency in that year, but opposed his Compromise tariff bill, and voted for the "Force bill" of the administration in the great nullification crisis of 1833, when he victoriously measured his forces in debate with Calhoun; united with him, nevertheless, in securing the passage of the famous resolutions condemning Jackson's course on the removal of the deposits Sept., 1833; purchased about this time an estate by the sea at Marshfield, Mass., which he made his summer residence; was recognized as the chief Northern leader of the Whig party, organized about 1834, upon the general break-up of the earlier parties; received the electoral vote of Massachusetts for the Presidency 1836; opposed the Sub-Treasury bill in Sept., 1837, in a speech reputed the most effective of all his arguments on that subject of finance; made a brief visit to Europe in 1839, being received in the court-circles of England and France with the attention due to his character and talents; took an active part in the Presidential campaign of 1840 in favor of Gen. Harrison, whose success he facilitated by his eloquence no less than by the prompt withdrawal of his own proposed candidacy for the second place on the ticket; was appointed secretary of state by President Harrison, Mar., 1841, and continued in office by Pres. Tyler; displayed consummate diplomatic ability in the negotiation of the "Ashburton treaty" of Aug. 9, 1842, which terminated in a favorable manner long-pending questions upon the impressment of seamen and the N. E. boundary of the [illegible]

ers. He possessed great strength; was from his youth passionately fond of athletic sports, hunting and fishing; paid much attention to scientific agriculture and to the improvement of stock on his celebrated Marshfield estate; was of genial and convivial habits and sometimes imprudent in the latter particular; was generous and improvident in money-matters, which had to be managed for him by a self-constituted committee of his lifelong supporters, the "solid men of Boston;" was devoted to his family and his friends, abounding in gayety and humor in his conversation; was the superior representative of American [illegible] representative and logical aspect being master of a pure vigorous English style, cultivated by close and long-continued study of the English classics; and in grasp of intellect has been excelled by few of his age or country. Early in life he joined the Congregational church, and though he did not remain actively identified with any religious body, was a diligent student of the Bible.—Johnson's Cyclopaedia.

Characteristics and Incidents

There are very few men, in this or any other country who possess the faculty of winning and keeping personal friends to as great an extent as did Mr. Webster. So simple and unpretending was he in his manners, and so kind-hearted and affectionate, that those who were privileged to know him intimately had their admiration greatly increased, and learned to love him with a devoted affection.

No man in the country was more fond of outdoor recreations than Mr. Webster. He had no taste or fondness for indoor amusements. He never played a game of chess, or checkers, or billiards, or tenpins in his life, and it is said that he was equally ignorant of cards, unless it was whist, a game [illegible]

Webster's Home.

THE HOUSE AT MARSHFIELD—THE TOMB [illegible] THE DEFENDER OF THE CONSTITUTION—QUAINT EPITAPHS IN THE OLD GRAVEYARD.

A correspondent of a Philadelphia paper, who visited Marshfield in the latter part of June last, gives the following description of the historic spot, which will be read with peculiar interest at this time:

In the Visitors Record, preserved at the Webster Place, is this pathetic entry: "Ashburton Webster, the last male descendant of Daniel Webster bearing his name, died in New York city, aged 30 years, Jan. 22d, 1879. * * * The old house burnt on Feb. 14th, at half past 3 o'clock a. m., 1878. All gone." On the place occupied by the old house has been erected a charming modern villa, with seven gables and wide piazzas; the spirit of hospitality, not frightened away by the flames, still reigns and the modern house, though not so large as the old, might still be called "Liberty Hall."

When Daniel Webster was alive, thirty years ago, as he stood on his housetop, he could say with Alexander Selkirk, "I am monarch of all I survey." As far as his eye reached extended his domain. [illegible] and orchards, with hay fields and tillage, with undulating uplands and wide flat salt marshes, constituted a patrimony of which any man might well be proud.

In those days it was a long drive to Boston by stage, but the sea came up to the garden wall and his yacht, laden with provisions, could anchor within three minutes walk of the house. The house itself, an ante-Revolutionary mansion, had been enlarged and with its thirty rooms offered accommodation for a small army of visitors. The [illegible] is familiar to every one—his popularity with all the neighbors, his junketings, his fishing excursions; the best picture of him represents him with pole in hand with his famous white hat, dressed for out-of-door life. After his death the house became a Mecca for pilgrims. The first visitor to inscribe his name on the record was Edward Everett and the date was Aug. 3d, 1853. One summer there were several thousand who paid their respects to the memory of the defender of the constitution. It is an interesting record; from all over the world men came—Cuban planters, [illegible]

WEBSTER AT MARSHFIELD.

HOW THE GREAT STATESMAN LIVED AT HIS COUNTRY HOME—INTERESTING ANECDOTES OF MARSHFIELD'S FARMER—THE PLACE AS IT NOW IS AND AS IT WAS.

The quiet and sober old town of Marshfield, located close down by the sea, is as intimately associated with the name of Webster as Mount Vernon is with Washington or Monticello with that of Jefferson. At the present time the town is very generally settled, but at the time when Mr. Webster first looked upon it, it was as sparsely settled a hamlet as the most retired citizen could desire. Nestled close down by the sea-shore, quite close to Green Harbor, stood, in 1821, on the unique Thomas farm, the old homestead of Captain Thomas of Revolutionary fame, and when Mr. Webster first saw it he was charmed with the house and its surroundings. The place commanded an exceptionally fine view of the ocean, and was especially provided with natural and artificial advantages for farming. The neighboring hills which [illegible] and [illegible] from the rest of the world and isolated the magnificent farm in a perfect amphitheatre. Mr. Webster had a natural taste for farming, which he was brought up to when a boy, and when he first became acquainted with Marshfield he was delighted with the location and the appearance. Mrs. Webster also shared this same appreciation for a farm in a quiet country district, and for several summers they were boarders in the family of Captain Thomas. As Mr. Webster became more acquainted with the place the desire to become the owner of Thomas farm grew stronger and still stronger [illegible] about his farm or waded through the neighboring marshes, apparently bent on taking mental as well as physical recreation, his mind was then engaged in framing some of his now famous political speeches.

Mr. Webster was an early riser, and when at home the villagers were wont to see him driving through the streets in a small cart which the village people called "Webster's trout-cart." In this cart he would drive away from home down to the shore, and being a genuine disciple of Izaak Walton, he would spend the forenoon fishing along the creeks or in his boat out on the bay. After succeeding in capturing a sufficient quantity of the finny tribe he would load them on to his trout wagon and drive back to his farm, with a fine big trout or rock cod in season for dinner.

There is a ludicrous and it is claimed a true story told of Mr. Webster as a farmer. He was considerably interested in experiments in fertilizing and was continually trying to find out what would make the best fertilizer. For several years he put kelp, which he hauled up from the [illegible] on his land. Then he learned that menhaden fish and [illegible] quantities [illegible] carted to his place and spread on his lands. The decaying fish, of course, attracted and generated large quantities of a peculiar small black fly, which swarmed all over the neighborhood and became a pest. Because they were produced, through the means of Mr. Webster's experimenting, the [illegible] gave them the appellation of the Webster fly.

The sickness and death of Mr. Webster and the dramatic incidents connected with it are familiar to every schoolboy in the land. When confined to his bed, and not being able scarcely to move, he still turned his thoughts to his lands and stocks, and every morning he used to ask that some of his favorite cattle be driven up to the window so that he might still look out once more and see them before he died. The funeral services, according [illegible]

[illegible]

The visitors to the "old place" will look upon an altogether different house than the one that once knew Webster. Several years ago the famous old barn was destroyed by fire and a few years subsequently the "home" of the great statesman shared the same fate. Now a substantial modern mansion stands in the place of the old farm house, and the young trees that Mr. Webster planted so copiously have grown up and now make quite a grove around the place. The well-appointed farm also [illegible] nevertheless [illegible] the [illegible] citizen with feelings of reverence for the departed genius, who himself loved those scenes so well.

The Reward of Good News.

The successor to the Egyptian throne always rewards the person informing him of the death of his predecessor by promoting him to the rank of bey and paying him 100,000 piastres ($5000). When Said Pasha, to whom Ismail Pasha, the late khedive, succeeded, was dangerously ill at Alexandria, Ismail Pasha himself was at Cairo. It is said to have been proved beyond a doubt that Said Pasha died of slow poison which Ismail Pasha had personally administered, and when Ismail subsequently did the same thing successfully to many others Egyptians said that the victims had been "Saided." Be this as it may, Said Pasha was seriously unwell at Alexandria, and the ambitious Ismail was anxiously awaiting at Cairo the news of his demise. At that time the Eastern Telegraph Company had not yet established their lines all over Egypt, and Cairo was joined to Alexandria by a single line belonging to the Egyptian government, and which was managed by a certain Mr. Thomas, an Englishman, who is still in the service of the country, and who, only a month ago, sent a false telegram to Arabi Pasha, purporting to come from Arabi's friend Ninet, telling him that there was no fear of the British occupying the Suez Canal, and that he need not take steps in that direction to oppose them, when the British fleet was actually on its way to seize the canal.

Mr. Thomas knew how anxious Ismail Pasha was to receive the news of Said Pasha's death, and he further knew that the reward to the person first informing Ismail Pasha would be 100,000 piastres—both of which would be very acceptable to Mr. Thomas himself, and which he resolved to get. His office was in Alexandria, but, knowing that the news must come over the telegraph wire which he controlled, he told his subordinates at Alexandria that he was going on a visit of inspection to Cairo, where he might stay for some time. He asked them to be very careful during his absence, especially as to all the important news concerning Said Pasha's health—about which poor Ismail Pasha was very uneasy—and, mounting his dromedary, started to Cairo.

The Cairo office was then managed by a young American from Baltimore named Tinney, to whose surprise Mr. Thomas, instead of going to the hotel as he had always done, took up his quarters at the telegraph station, where, besides staying all day, he also passed the night. He never left the office for one minute, having his meals brought to him there, and always being near the instrument to see what passed over the wire. The system by which the telegraph was worked in Egypt was by impressions of dots and lines on paper bands, and not by sound as it is in America, and Mr. Thomas kept his eye on the slip for fully ten days and nights and yet the news he was so anxiously expecting came not. Young Tinney was at a loss to understand what all this meant, and was much annoyed by the manager's proceedings, who he thought suspected him, and therefore watched him. Mr. Thomas had by this time become quite nervous, the effects of sleepless nights were plainly visible in his face, and at about 3 o'clock one afternoon, feeling exhausted, he told Tinney that he was going to take a little rest on the floor, giving him strict orders to call him in case any telegram came about the death of Said Pasha. Tinney then, for the first time, discovered what all Mr. Thomas's anxiety was about, and as soon as the latter was fast asleep he called an Arab book-keeper, from whom he learned in a casual way, as if in no way interested, that the bearer of the news of Said Pasha's death to his successor, Ismail Pasha, would receive the rank of bey and 100,000 piastres.

Hour after hour passed; many business and other telegrams came, but not the one expected. At the commencement Mr. Thomas awoke every time the instrument ticked and asked what it was, but at last he slept so heavily that no ordinary noise would wake him.

About two hours from midnight "tick, tick, tick" went the instrument. Young Tinney became all eyes and ears, and he knew in a few seconds that Said Pasha had just then expired at Alexandria. He immediately tore away the slip, unscrewed the instrument, took away part of it with him, and pulling off his boots, left the room, making a little noise as possible. For further security, he went up to the story above and disconnected the wire. He then ran as fast as he could in the direction of the Ezbekieh road, where he knew Ismail Pasha lived. Arriving at the little kiosque the latter then occupied, he was stopped by the guard, but upon telling him that he had run all the way from the telegraph station to give the pasha news of a revolution that had broken out in Alexandria during the night, he was kept in the basement until word was brought from up-stairs that Ismail Pasha would receive him. The moment he saw the telegraph operator enter he knew what had happened, as nobody had been more anxiously expecting the news than himself, not even Mr. Thomas. Tinney told him in English, which language Ismail Pasha understands, that Said Pasha was dead, and then gave him the slip off the instrument. Ismail asked him his name, and upon his saying George Tinney, the pasha, who was now viceroy of Egypt, wrote something on a piece of paper, and handing it to him, said: "Tinney Bey, I thank you very much; here is an order on the treasury for 100,000 piastres, and the firman naming you bey will be the first I shall sign."

The Comet Cruls.

The comet Cruls seems likely to go into the permanent record of remarkable comets. The peculiar circumstances of its discovery, first announcement and early progress, give it a certain distinction, although, as remarked the other day, there is herein something tantalizing. It was first seen by Dr. L. Cruls of the observatory at Rio Janeiro, on the morning of September 12, which was six days prior to its perihelion passage. By slow stages the news was sent to Europe, via the South American cable, and there announced September 14, and in this country on the afternoon of the same day. Immediately upon being seen here and in Europe, a prolonged storm set in, and during the most brilliant part of the comet's passage when it was nearest the sun it was obscured by clouds on so much of both continents as is within the frontier of scientific observation. Thus was lost to view the most magnificent part of its march around the sun. But even now that it has become many times bedimmed by its wider separation from the sun, it is a beautiful and majestic luminary, almost without comparison, and will well repay the early gazer, as thousands can testify who on these recent days have sprung from their beds and shaken off the lethargies of the night to behold it as it

Flames in the forehead of the morning sky.

It is certain that it has few peers in respect to its beauty and apparent size in the history of at least modern astronomy, and the observers at Cambridge say that nothing to be compared with it in these respects has been seen since the year 1858. The comet of 1858 was an object of great beauty and sublimity, and as it hung resplendent in the western sky, during the evening hours, for a period of months, gave favorable opportunity for observing it, not only scientifically, but (if it may be so expressed) artistically. Numerous sketches of it were taken on successive evenings by the observers then stationed at Cambridge, and these sketches, at the expense in part of wealthy citizens of Boston, were engraved in the finest style of art, and published as illustrations of a volume in which were collated technical observations of the comet made in various parts of the world. This volume is one of the most noteworthy in the list of illustrated astronomical publications, and is probably the most costly single volume ever issued with the imprimatur of Harvard College observatory. Distinguished as that comet thus was because of its beauty and brilliancy, the comet now visible is hardly less noteworthy. Indeed, if presented with the same advantages of the absence of daylight, this would perhaps excel as a picturesque object. But as visibly blazoned upon the sky that had a manifest superiority in its form, which has been compared to that of a scimeter, while in the pervading darkness its tail was extended to an extraordinary length, and with the utmost tenuity in its outer extremity. The tail of this comet shoots upward with as great density and to a length nearly corresponding, so far as the naked eye observations are concerned, but, in the presence of the advancing daylight, without that tenuity which was so fascinating a characteristic of the comet of 1858. The tail of this comet is of a remarkable brilliancy even to its outer verge. Taking into consideration both nucleus and tail, it is judged by Professor Pickering that this comet has, as now seen, a greater total brightness than that of 1858. In one respect the two are notably alike, and that is in the sharply defined edge of the tail. With both this sharp outline is on the convex side of the tail, but there is at the same time this unlikeness, that the sharp edge here as seen by the spectator is the right hand or southerly edge, while the corresponding edge of the tail of the comet of 1858 is at the left hand.

The Barbecue in Southern Politics.

The Atlanta Constitution, half seriously and half humorously, laments the disappearance from the South of the political barbecue, which flourished in the times "when it was possible for opposing political parties in Georgia, each having the best interests of the State and the country solely in view, to meet and mingle upon terms of equality and fraternity and discuss the issues upon which the public intelligence was divided." Some times the discussions were heated, but usually they were good-humored. "The candidates travelled together sometimes, for economy's sake, in the same vehicle. They carried huge scrap-books and had their arguments arranged to suit each other's feelings. Upon the stand they would glare and glower at each other to the great delight of their partisans, but they generally left the stand arm-in-arm." The speakers' stand was usually placed in some green grove near a cool spring, and with the eloquence of the orators would be mingled the incense of the barbecue. Now, the Constitution goes on to say, great changes have been wrought; the old times have gone and a new era has come in with clamor and irritation; and politics have been trimmed down to one fateful issue, over which there can be no division or discussion among the whites.

Owing to competition between the Eastern and the narrow gauge beach road, the fare between East Boston and Lynn has been reduced to five cents.

Under the permission recently given by Warden Earle, more than half the convicts at the state prison at Concord have allowed their beards to grow.

A watermelancholy incident happened in Indiana the other day. A train load of colored people were side-tracked at Evansville to wait for another train to pass. As it happened there was a melon patch near by. The party looked at it, and their mouths watered. They restrained themselves for a moment, till a colored boy got over the fence and broke open a melon across his knee. The sight of the gore of the melon seemed to madden them, and in less than ten seconds the whole train of colored men was over the fence. The engineer whistled, the fireman rung the bell and the conductor yelled "All aboard," but they came not until they had ruined two acres of melons and vines. The owner of the field went crazy as he saw the black people spreading over his farm, and the conductor was wild as he saw the floors of the cars, but the grinning countenances of the sable crowd betrayed no sign of regret at the sinful scoop.

"I won't sell you my vote nohow," said old Slocum to the man who had come to "see" him. "Why not?" "For three reasons: Fust, I kin ara half a dollar diggin taters in the time it would take me to go an' vote. Second, it would cos' $1 fer er team to go to the pollin' place. Third, ye on'y offer me $2, an t'other side has already gin me $3 to stay away an' not vote at all, which brings up the finanshal reasons on that side ter $1.50."

It is a Fact.

At Hetherston's store,
I've got the best bargain
I e'er got before.
I found for ten dollars
Some excellent tea,
Sound, strong and sweet flavored
As any can be.
Then Hetherston's kindness
I'll never forget—
As a present he gave me
A handsome Tea Set.

She called in our neighbors
With wondering eyes,
They one and all said
That "It was a surprise."
She calls me her dear
And I call her my bride.
And she smiles as she cheerfully
Comes by my side;
There we both sit
As happy as can be,
Out of Hetherston's cups
Drinking Hetherston's tea.

They intend to keep up the good reputation and loyal to friends, to country and to the interests of society, their work was singularly effective in the advancing of western civilization. With seeming reckless ness, their efforts were in the interest of law and order, and the people owe them a debt of gratitude they do not forget. Their page in history is as fascinating as it is honorable, and there is a peculiar pleasure in reading the narrative of their wonderful exploits. Among those, whose careers were singularly adventurous, are Kit Carson, Wild Bill, Buffalo Bill, Capt. Payne, Texas Jack, California Joe, Capt. Jack and others, whose achievements have made them justly and widely famous. They have a warm place in the hearts of the people, and a prominent place in their admiration. It is appropriate that their achievements should be recorded, and we note with pleasure the forthcoming of a new book from the press of N. D. Thompson & Co., New York and St. Louis, called "The Heroes of the Plains" covering the ground of border history. It is profusely illustrated with 100 engravings and 16 colored lithograph plates. It is sold by subscription through canvassing agents, and presents an opportunity for agents to make money especially inviting. We advertise it in another column.

"Treasury of Song."

It is seldom that we can commend a book so strongly as that named above. "Treasury of Song" is indeed a treasury. It contains nearly 300 choice selections from the various departments, sacred, classical, humorous. These extend over 500 royal octavo pages, well printed on superior paper, and giving the instrumental accompaniments wherever necessary.

Myron W. Whitney, the great American basso, writes the publishers thus: "If generally introduced in musical homes, you will deprive vocalists of their best excuse for not singing on invitation, since the assertion, 'I have no music with me,' will have no force in the presence of 'Treasury of Song.' The Kansas City Journal says: There is not a song in the entire collection that could be omitted without marring the completeness of the book." The Rev. R. B. Hull, of New York City says: "It is impossible, I think, to make a better." Prof. Hugh A. Clark, of the University of Pennsylvania declares: "I am glad to bear my testimony to the excellence and variety of the selections it contains." Prof. Clark, is one of the highest authorities in music.

A series of sketches, and portraits of eminent musicians and singers is included in the book, making in all about 550 pages. The binding is beautiful and the whole work is superb. It has been published by Hubbard Brothers, Boston, Mass.

Heroes of the Plains.

HALL'S VEGETABLE SICILIAN HAIR RENEWER is a scientific examination of some of the most powerful restoratives agents in the vegetable kingdom. It restores gray hair to its original color. It makes the scalp white and clean. It cures dandruff and humors, and falling-out of the hair. It furnishes the nutritive principles by which the hair is nourished and supported. It makes the hair moist, soft and glossy, and is unsurpassed as a hair dressing. It is the most economical preparation ever offered to the public, as its effects remain a long time, making only an occasional application necessary. It is recommended and used by eminent medical men, and officially endorsed by the State Assayer of Massachusetts. The popularity of Hall's Hair Renewer has increased with the test of many years, both in this country and in foreign lands, and it is now known and used in all the civilized countries of the world.
